

Walls Can Teach—“Door-Post Theology”

It is our firm conviction that halls and walls can be teaching tools. Did you know that Thomas Jefferson designed the crown molding of the lecture hall at the University of Virginia to reflect a variety of different styles? When asked about his choices, he responded that even when students are daydreaming they can be learning about something. Perhaps this, in part, is also reflected in Moses' command to take God's commands and precepts and *"write them on the doorframes of your houses and on your gates. . ."

Our desire is that when children step into the children's area, not only will they be immediately engaged with the Gospel, but the decor will say, "You're welcome here. You're special. This is an exciting place where learning about the Bible comes to life." This is our purpose: to surround our kids with the Gospel so that even by walking down the hallway or just by sitting in a classroom, we can minister to both them and their families.
